

Acknowledgements

We are grateful to the employers who took part in this research who gave very generously of their time to discuss their experiences and opinions with us. Case study research requires considerable co-operation from employers and all those who participated were extremely helpful in terms of allowing us time to interview members of senior management and facilitating access to employees. We are also indebted to the employees who participated in the research for their contribution. We would also like to express our gratitude to Isobel Hines and the research team at the Department of Work and Pensions (DWP) for their key role in the design and planning of this study and Alan Hedges for his assistance with this. We would also like to thank Moray Sharp of Lane, Clark and Peacock for his technical assistance of the study.
